

HARVARD COLLEGE LAW REVIEW

harvardcollegelawreview@gmail.com

OVERVIEW

A student-run research publication at Harvard University, the Harvard College Law Review seeks to foster scholarly discourse on topical and historical issues pertaining to law or the legal system. In this spirit, the journal's principal objective is to publish exceptional undergraduate works, drawn from an array of disciplinary perspectives that evaluate and elucidate the intricacies, vagaries, and nuances of law as they relate to domestic and international affairs, business, academia, and society. HCLR aims to sustain and enrich a vibrant discussion about law at the undergraduate level because it recognizes that the student writers of today will be the leaders, lawyers, and scholars of the future. However, HCLR's content is certainly not limited to undergraduates as HCLR will publish enticing content drawing from articles authored by current undergraduate student, graduate students and professors.

As the only undergraduate law journal on campus and the oldest undergraduate law journal, the Harvard College Law Journal will attract a diverse audience from over 6,400 current undergraduates as well as the numerous alumni in the Boston area. HCLR's readership will thus encompass some of the brightest undergraduate and graduate students from all fields of study, ideal for advertisers promoting anything from internship and job opportunities to tutoring or food services.
